Small Mobile Pieces of National Sovereignty?

Uncrewed Vessels, Naval Diplomacy, and the Challenge of Signaling 15

Richard Dunley

Naval employment of uncrewed platforms is expanding, but their status and perception among both operators and adversaries are still evolving, with key differences from crewed platforms that affect diplomacy, political signaling, and conflict escalation.

Clausewitzian Friction and Twenty-First-Century War

The Paradox of Technology 35

Nikolas Gardner

New and emerging technologies—especially affecting sensors, networks, autonomy, and computing—are changing Clausewitz's concept of friction in warfare. While these technologies appear to reduce some aspects of friction, they amplify others and may introduce new ones altogether.

The Failure of German Naval Force Design, 1928–39 55

Mark Stanovich

In the early years of World War II, Germany came perilously close to cutting off Great Britain's vital sea-lanes. The ultimate failure can be traced to force-design mistakes in the decade prior to war, illuminating the political, industrial, and strategic challenges facing nations redesigning their force structures today.

The Return of Private Maritime-Security Companies and Their Role in Twenty-First-Century Maritime Security 77

Pieter W. G. Zhao

Vietnam and the Four Nos

How Chinese Actions in the South China Sea Influence
Vietnam's Hedging Strategy 115

Jeff Zeberlein

Vietnam's policy of nonentanglement called the "Four Nos"—intended to hedge against China's political, economic, and military strength—is challenged by Beijing's increasing aggression and maximalist claims in the South China Sea, opening opportunities for U.S. policy in the region.
